Two Air Force Cadets Complete Flight Instruction Program

Cadet Major Louis M. Bell, electrical engineering major from Wellesley, and Cadet Captain Will A. Crook, Jr., architectural engineering major from Rison, recently completed the Flying Instruction Program (FIP).

Bell and Crook were among 1,500 Senior AFROTC Cadets who took their flight test for nearly 50,000 hours as the Flying Instruction Program got under way at 100 colleges and universities throughout the country.

The Flying Instruction Program, an integral part of the AFROTC curriculum for all seniors who have applied and qualified for Air Force pilot training, is designed to provide a screening and motivation device which will identify those who lack the basic aptitude or desire for Air Force pilot training, and to almost completely dominate the competition.

When the bands representing the two units competed, the Air Force mustarders were victorious.

Everyone had anticipated the conflict between the two nationally ranked drill teams. The Army's Pershing Rifles Drill Team and the Air Force Raiders, for a long time, have been rivals. The Pershing Rifles' last appearance in the Cherry Blossom festival was in 1967, and the Air Force had been the champion for the past five years.

After the two units had performed their respective routines, the Air Force salvaged some of the trophies and prevented the Army from completely dominating the competition.

Army Wins

manded by Benjamin Mithchell, the well-polished squad defeated a similar sized unit from the Air Force by a score of 56-6 in 9.1.

Not discouraged by the Army's success, the Air Force produced its first winner in the flight-photos event. Karl Broun commanded the Air Force flight which defeated an Air Force platoon under the command of Bobby Miller.

The Army was still dominating things; however, when the company-squadron's event was completed, the Army appeared well on its way to an unprecedented second win in two years. Willie Harris 'Lightning' Company A defeated the Air Force squadron 67-0 under the command of Louis Bell.

By winning the last two events, the Air Force salvaged some of the trophies and prevented the Army from completely dominating the competition.

African Officers: Visit Campus

A group of agricultural officers from Kenya, Sierra Leone and the Republic of Togo recently arrived in this country and was welcomed at a dinner meeting at A&T College.

The group, here under the auspices of the U.S. Agency for International Development, will study agricultural practices in North Carolina at A&T College and in several localities about the State during the next six weeks. Appearing on the program were John C. Dewey, director of the college; Waldo C. Fulkerson, former Greensboro city councilman; and Rev. Cecil Bishop, president, Greensboro Ministerial Fellowship.

Speaking on behalf of the visitors were Miss Grace Wagenaars and Ingrid Okla-Drozda, both of Kenya; Wilfred J. Bangert of Sierra Leone and Euphrat Amoukar of the Republic of Togo.

B. H. James, state agent, in charge of the A&T College Extension Service, presided.

sacrifices made by the family to send all the children to school. "Never lose faith; she continued to pray, to work hard, and to encourage us to continue in school even though it was a great sacrifice to the whole family." He continued by saying that she has become the model of a person who has gone to the County Board of Education requesting funds for the school. Her desire is to see all her children grown into adulthood and established in their homes.

Although she did not complete her formal education, Mrs. Brown has become educated through reading, observation, and community work. She has always encouraged prayer. She says, "Pray and then live in such a way that you deserve all the answers to your prayers."

Activities for Mothers Day included morning worship in Hartwell Auditorium, where Mrs. Brown received a bouquet from the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, and a "Mother of the Year Luncheon."

The speaker at the Morning Worship Exercises was Mrs. Elreta Melton Alexander, attorney at law in Greensboro, and Alumnus of A&T College.
